Your domain is your company's address on the internet and, in practice, the name people will look you up by. It's worth five minutes of thought before registering - changing it later costs traffic and credibility.

1. Short and easy to say out loud

- 1 If you have to spell it every time you say it, pick another. The test is simple: say it to someone and ask them to write it down.

- 2 Avoid hyphens and numbers - they get lost in speech and cause confusion ("three" or "3"?).

- 3 Prefer the company name over what it does. Descriptive names feel clever, but age badly as the business grows.

2. The right extension for who will use it

If your business is in Angola, the national extension says so at first glance - and reads as more trustworthy to local customers.

Extension	When it makes sense
.ao	The natural choice for a business in Angola. It signals local presence and is what Angolan customers expect.
.co.ao	A national alternative, also aimed at commercial activity in the country.
.it.ao	The cheaper national option, used mostly by technology projects.
.com	If you serve customers outside Angola, or want an international brand. Many register both .ao and .com.

3. Check before you commit

1

Confirm it's available before ordering business cards or a logo.

2

Check whether the name is already used by another company in your field - an available domain doesn't mean an available name.

3

If the name matters, register the main variants and point them all at the same site.

4. After registering

1

Point it at your hosting - see how to configure a domain's DNS.

2

Turn on auto-renewal, or register several years at once.

3

Set up e-mail on your own domain - see the Professional E-mail plan. Carrying on with a free e-mail address after buying a domain throws away half the benefit.

Don't let someone else register it in their name. If a developer or agency registers the domain under their own name, the domain is theirs - not yours. Always register it to your company; see who is who in a domain registration.
