Domain prices: how to read the table

Choosing & Registering · Created on September 26, 2026 · Updated on October 22, 2026 · 3 min read

The table on the domain pricing page shows four columns side by side, and that is deliberate: what a name costs to get is not what it costs to keep. Reading all four saves you the surprise that usually arrives with the first renewal.

The four columns

Column	What it tells you
Register	What you pay to take the name, for one year. Paid once, when you register.
Renew	What you pay every following year to keep it. This is the number that stays with you.
Transfer	What it costs to bring a name you already hold elsewhere over to us.
Purpose	What the extension is for, or who it is meant for. Some have a defined audience and ask for proof.

Why registering and renewing are not always the same price

The price of each extension is set by the registry that runs it, not by us. In some extensions the entry price is lower than the upkeep price; in others the two are identical to the cent. There is no rule to memorise, only the table. That is exactly why both columns sit next to each other instead of only the first one being shown.

> Read the renewal column before you settle on an extension.
> Registration is paid once; renewal is paid every year for as long as the business lasts. Over five years, it is the second column that decides the bill.

What you pay in the transfer column

The transfer column shows the price of bringing the domain here from another provider. It is one year of renewal, and that year is added to the time you have already paid for: nothing is lost.

Every extension transfers with the EPP code, national ones included. You only give it after paying: we e-mail you asking for it.

Finding your extension in the list

1. Filter by category. The buttons above the table separate the local extensions, other countries, business, technology, education and media. Each button shows how many extensions sit behind it.

2. Or type in the search box. The list narrows as you type, with or without the leading dot.

3. Show more rows. The selector under the table changes how many extensions appear at a time. If you are comparing, put them all on one page and search with the browser itself.

The list holds the extensions we register today, not every extension in the world. If yours is missing, ask us before you give up on it.

What the table does not include

The figures are per year, and they are the same ones the cart charges: both come from the same source, so there is no shop window price and a different till price. What the table leaves out is any applicable tax, which is added at checkout, where you see it before you pay.

Registering for several years at once is possible in the extensions that allow it, and the cart shows you the total the moment you pick the term. The table deliberately shows a single year, because that is the only way to compare one extension against another.

RECOMMENDED

Put the extensions side by side before you commit to a name.
